(15)

It is often easier and clearer to communicate using signs and symbols, which represent (stand for) something. Until about 100 years ago, very few people could read. If a shop wanted to attract customers, signs were put outside. Today, we still use signs and symbols they are a very simple and quick way of communicating information. They are particularly useful at airports, where people often do not speak the local language.

Flashing lights in a lighthouse have been used for over 2,000 years to warn of danger at sea. Signals that we can hear include the sound of drums, church bells and sirens. Church bells are used tell us that a service is about to start. Sirens are used in wartime, for example, to warn of air raids. A code is a pattern that means something. Morse code and semaphore are two of the most famous codes. Morse code uses long and short pulses of light or sound (dashes and dots) to represent numbers and letters, while semaphore uses the positions of two flags.

Questions:

- i) What is the use of “flashing lights”?
